Cinema. The nature of cinema itself dominates 8 1/2, since the film is largely structured around Guido's loss of faith in his creative voice.Throughout the film, people offer unsolicited advice on cinema's role in the world. The first to do so is the writer, Daumier, who boldly states that cinema lags behind all other artistic mediums by 50 years.

The name of the section—"The Theatre"—sets up a major theme of the novel. The theatre is something that exists in all "time zones" of the book: past, present, and future. The importance of theatre as a way of expressing oneself reveals itself as more than a luxury for an advanced society; it becomes a necessity even in a struggling one.
