An interesting passage from the book, A Manual of Psychological Medicine, published in England in 1879 by John Charles Bucknill and Daniel Hack Tuke, lists the “Exciting or Determining Causes of Insanity” which are divided into Moral and Physical categories. This list provides the reasons, upon admission, why people were admitted to mental hospitals in England.
Psychological Medicine is a journal aimed primarily for the publication of original research in clinical psychiatry and the basic sciences related to it. These include relevant fields of biological, psychological and social sciences. Review articles, editorials and letters to the Editor discussing published papers are also published.

Treating physicians Bucknill and Tuke’s A Manual of Psychological Medicine and novelist Bulwer Lytton’s A Strange Story as influential case studies, it explores in particular the Gothic-styled spectralisation used by both Victorian medical and literary authors to characterize females whose mental disorders are depicted as bound with a short- or long-term inability to reproduce.
